What is WWPHacks?

WWPHacks is a hackathon - a collaborative programming competition where teams of up to four work against the clock to build innovative technological solutions to real world problems.

Participants will have 24 hours to communicate and work on their project with their team, with the opportunity to participate in numerous workshops and mini-events along the way. Once projects are finished, contestants will submit them for judging. A team of judges will analyze projects based on metrics such as neatness, creativity, and implementation. Interesting prizes will be awarded to winners. At the end of the day, participants will leave the hackathon with technical experience, new friends, and the feeling of fulfillment.

Who will be there?

WWPHacks is open to all participants, regardless of their background or skill, provided that they are currently enrolled in a high school or pursuing a non-traditional education between the age of 13-18. Based on what we have seen in our pilot program, HackHSN, we expect roughly 250 attendees, from a variety of different backgrounds all over the world. Due to the event being online this year, our marketing and advertising efforts will be focused through social media, with a wider reach than usual. Naturally, the vast majority of our participants will come from programming majors and focuses, although we expect a significant number of aspiring electrical and mechanical engineers, graphic designers, and biomedical engineers as well. Additionally, we expect quite a few budding entrepreneurs to make an appearance.
